

In this study, we present a model of human ventricular cardiomyocyte in which the transverse-axial tubular system (TATS) was described as a single compartment. Computer simulations result in a quantitative analysis of ion concentration changes in the tubular lumen at different stimulation rates.